

The LTI Process

The process of finding a real-world learning experience begins with having students identify their interests. The process continues with students connecting with adults through informational interviews, shadow days and possibly internship experiences. This entire process is referred to as LTI (Learning Through Interests).

If your students have completed the Interest Inventories, you've already begun a dialogue about the professional world. You should now have a fuller picture of what each student's strengths, weaknesses, passions, interests and values are. This knowledge can help you to guide them in their searches, and help them to develop skills in needed areas.

The graphic below demonstrates all of the moving parts of the LTI Process.
